Under Canadian law, the right to file a design application originates with the "Proprietor". The "proprietor" is defined as the author of the design, unless the author created the design for another person or company for a consideration, in which case such other person or company is treated as the "proprietor". It follows that, if the author is an employee of a company, the company is the "proprietor". The applicant may be the "proprietor" or an assignee of the "proprietor". There is no need to file an assignment when filing in the name of the assignee, but the assignment must be effective at the filing date.
